WHEN MEN WERE MEN. ✓

MAY 11 1925

This was in those good old days, long, long, ago, before Prohibition. Charley Cave man was a strong dashing young shiek, out his way.

He had a trained Dinasouris that acted as a crane and lifted the rock away from his door each morning. Then he'd strut out, do his daily dozen, and take a long walk; juggling his spiked club. One day when he is juggling his club it falls on his head and knocks him coo-koo.

About noon time he has a wrestling match with a Dinasouris, and knocks the darn animal cold. Then he uses it as a saw to cut down a big tree. When he has the tree sawed in too, he throws the Dinasouris over the hill. He lifts the big tree off the stump and drops it on the ground, and it goes right through. He finds a leopard sitting on the top part of it growling at him, he "socks" the animal in the chin and knocks the spots off it.

Later that afternoon as Leolla Rodsybill, the local cave girl was out riding her pet tiger, she runs across Charley cave man, as he was sitting in the sun, pining for a mate.

Charley starts chasing Leolla, and grabs on the tigers tail to hold on, but she pushes him in the face, and he rolls along in the dust behind. He chases her right into her own house, and a long hard battle follows, but Charley finally drags her out by her hair. He takes her right over to her lazy, sleepy, no account papa and shouts out, "She's Mine." He wakes up and congratulates Charley and says, "Good."

But right then little Beolla comes too, picks up a club, and knocks Charley clear over the horizon into the deep golden distance. Charley lands right in front of his cave and drags himself slowly in.

Aesop Says: "A real he-man can make his wife do anything she wants to."
